US Recession Probability Model

The Conference Board predicts a 96 percent likelihood of a recession in the 12 months based on our probability model. This is a positive expectation of a recession before the end of 2023. However, the Conference Board's probability model is based on forecasts issued by the Federal Reserve's external rate hike. The last recession of 2022 and the last quarter of 2023 are closely tied to the real GDP growth rates.

When the recession probability model is near zero after the initial phase of the special pandemic from September 2020 to May 2022, it rose to over 30 percent in April and reached 50 percent in May. This means that the US economy is likely to enter a recession within a year from that point forward. The probability has kept rising since then.

Recession probability models are also useful in signaling the end of economic downturns. They tend to fall rapidly following recessions and, in other words, the likelihood of the economy being in recession within the next 12 months falls below 20 percent, usually within six to ten months. We will monitor this measure to help assess all the economic data that comes out of the government recession.

For more information on our US recession probability model, please see our website: <https://www.conferenceboard.com>
