PENTAGON SAYS IT DOESN'T WANT CONFLICT WITH IRAN AFTER STRIKE EXCHANGE IN SYRIA

The organization reviewed a series of research papers published in academic journals that were co-authored by other researchers, or faculty at each of the five universities, along with people from the Iranian Aerospace Research Institute, Iran University of Science and Technology, and the third University of Technology.

The Aerospace Research Institute is the only entity that is directly sanctioned by the U.S. government, according to the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control. The letters sent to the universities allege that Clarkson and Virginia Tech both collaborated with ARI on two separate research papers.

But the source said that the Iran University of Science and Technology is a "consortium" of several Iranian academic institutions that includes Malek Ashtar University of Technology, which was sanctioned by the U.S. government for its role in assisting in the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Similarly, Shah University, which is not sanctioned by the U.S., according to OFAC's database, has been sanctioned by the EU and the United Kingdom.

Virginia Tech, Virginia Polytechnic, and UT Lafayette all told the Washington Examiner that their actions were entirely legal and did not sidestep any federal sanctions. Clarkson University and the University of Washington said they were looking into the matter.

In a statement to the Washington Examiner, a spokesman for Virginia Tech said, "The university's Office of Sponsored Research has never entered into a contact with Aerospace Research Institute in Iran."

A spokesperson for UT Lafayette likewise said the collaborative work of electrical and computer engineering professor Alf Fecht with people from the Iran University of Science and Technology was "with researchers at a university that is not a sanctioned entity."

The Aerospace Research Institute is the only entity that is directly sanctioned by the U.S. government, according to the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control. The letters sent to the universities allege that Clarkson and Virginia Tech both collaborated with ARI on two separate research papers.

But the nonprofit says that the Iran University of Science and Technology is a "consortium" of several Iranian academic institutions that includes Malek Ashtar University of Technology, which was sanctioned by the U.S. government for its role in assisting in the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Similarly, Sharif University, while not sanctioned by the U.S., according to OFAC's database, has been sanctioned by the EU and the United Kingdom.

Virginia Tech, Worcester Polytechnic, and UL Lafayette all told the Washington Examiner that their actions were entirely legal and had not sidestepped any federal sanctions. Clarkson University and the University of Washington said they were looking into the matter.

In a statement to the Washington Examiner, a spokesman for Virginia Tech said, "The university's Office of Sponsored Research has never entered into a contact with Aerospace Research Institute in Iran."

A spokesperson for UL Lafayette likewise said the collaborative work of electrical and computer engineering professor Afef Fekih with people from the Iran University of Science and Technology was "with researchers at a university that is not a sanctioned entity."

The Aerospace Research Institute is the only entity that is directly sanctioned by the U.S. government according to the Treasury's Office of Foreign Assets Control. The letters sent to the universities include that Clarkson and Virginia Tech both collaborated with ARI on two separate research papers.

But the report also says that the Iran University of Science and Technology is a consortium of several Iranian academic institutions that includes Malek Ashraf University of Technology, which was sanctioned by the U.S. government for its role in assisting in the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Its main staff research center, which is not sanctioned by the U.S., according to OFAC's database, has been sanctioned by the EU and the United Kingdom.

Virginia Tech, Worcester Polytechnic, and U.S. Lafayette all told the Washington Examiner that their actions were entirely legal and they had not sidestepped any federal sanctions. Clarkson University and the University of Washington said they were looking into the matter.

In a statement to the Washington Examiner, a spokesman for Virginia Tech said, "The university's Office of International Research has never entered into a contact with Aerospace Research Institute in Iran."

A spokesman for U.S. Lafayette likewise said the collaborative work of electrical and computer engineering professor AMF Fakhri with people from the Iran University of Science and Technology was with researchers at a university that is not a sanctioned entity.

"The University does not collaborate with sanctioned entities," the spokesman said.

At Worcester Polytechnic Institute, a spokesman said a research paper from two students in collaboration with researchers at the Iran University of Science and Technology was submitted before either student came to the institute in 2021.
