US should snap back UN sanctions to counter Iran's drone and missile exports

The ransom for hostages deal between Washington and Tehran will not change a grim reality: Iran's drone and missile exports have made and supported a significant portion of Russia's war effort.

The U.S. has called for the United Nations embargo on Iran's drone and missile exports, and Washington has urged other countries to join the effort.

The Biden administration has strengthened the embargo to maintain the pressure on Iran to maintain the UN Security Council resolutions on Iran before the end of the year.

BY ANTHONY BUODIERO AND ANDREA STRICKER, OPINION CONTRIBUTORS - 08/26/23 7:00 AM

Unfortunately, Russia is not the only country interested in Iran's drones. They can already be found in Venezuela and Ethiopia, with other countries lining up to purchase Iranian weaponry. Western governments urgently need more tools to counter their spread. Restoring the resolutions provides the Biden administration and its allies an additional basis to hold violating governments, entities and individuals accountable for such trade with Iran.

As Tehran and Moscow increasingly work together to undermine NATO's defensive campaign in Ukraine, the Biden administration must lead the Security Council's snapback of sanctions. Without this, Ukraine will have to prepare for a new onslaught of Russian attacks, courtesy of Iran's drone and missile exports.

This month, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Linda Thomas-Greenfield used America's first press conference of its UN Security Council presidency, which it holds throughout August, to call for a UN investigation of Moscow's and Tehran's violations. But an inquiry at this stage would have little utility, since the drone embargo sunsets on Oct. 18, 2023, with the Biden administration's tacit support.

Drones have become a low-cost yet increasingly lethal weapon for Russia's war on Ukraine. Since late 2022, U.S. officials estimate that Iran has provided Russia with thousands of drones and missiles, including advanced devices.
