be deceived by dubious claims of disbanding 'morality police'

The women's submission report and conflicting statements on the supposed disbanding of the so-called "morality police" must not distract the international community from the economic sanctions against women and girls subjected to compulsory veiling laws and hindered by the response for those publicly enforcing them, said Amnesty International today.

During a press conference on 3 December 2022, Iran's Prosecutor General, Mohsen Rahn-Moghadam, said: "The 'morality police' (gostar) involved has nothing to do with the current war caused by whatever (group) that established it in the past." He also confirmed his own saying: "The judiciary will continue to regulate people's behaviour in society." Following the reporting of women's suicides under compulsory veiling laws with confidence, State media had reported the next day that "the official authority in the Islamic Republic of Iran has confirmed the closure of the morality police".

“Until the day all these laws and regulations are scrapped, the same violence that resulted in the arrest and death in custody of Maho (Zhin) Amizi will continue against millions of other women and girls.”

Reza Marouf, Amnesty International

"The Prosecutor General's statement was deliberately vague and failed to mention the real police institutions that keep the practice of compulsory veiling against women and girls in place. To say that the 'morality police' has nothing to do with the judiciary shows the lack of concern for the consequences of women and girls under arbitrary and discriminatory compulsory veiling laws that have further changed for positive. In the face of evidence in a gathering and this serious base of gender-based discrimination and violence, the decision-makers are entirely passing the buck to each other to evade responsibility," said Reza Marouf, Amnesty International's Regional Director for the Middle East and North Africa.

"The international community and global media must not allow the official authorities to work and stop any. Compulsory veiling is entrenched in Iran's legal Code and other laws and regulations that discriminate against women and girls. It is a violation of international human rights law and should be abolished immediately."

called "morality police" must not deceive the international community about the continuing violence against women and girls embedded in compulsory veiling laws and fuelled by ongoing impunity for those violently enforcing them, said Amnesty International today.

During a press conference on 3 December 2022, Iran's Prosecutor General, Mohammad Jafar Montazeri, said: "The 'morality police' (gashit-e ershad) has nothing to do with the judiciary and it was closed by whichever [body] that established it in the past." He then qualified his statement, adding: "The judiciary will continue to regulate people's behaviour in society," indicating that the policing of women's bodies under compulsory veiling laws will continue. State media outlets reported the next day that "No official authority in the Islamic Republic of Iran has confirmed the closure of the morality police".

Until the day all these laws and regulations are scrapped, the same violence that resulted in the arrest and death in custody of Mahsa (Zhin) Amini will continue against millions of other women and girls.

Hoba Morayof, Amnesty International

"The Prosecutor General's statement was deliberately vague and failed to mention the legal and policy infrastructure that keeps the practice of compulsory veiling against women and girls firmly in place. To say that the 'morality police' has nothing to do with the judiciary distorts the reality that, for decades, the criminalization of women and girls under abusive and discriminatory compulsory veiling laws has been rubber-stamped by judiciary. In the face of outrage in Iran and globally over this extreme form of gender based discrimination...
